Dictionary of American Biography- American Council of Learned Societies 2018-09-28 Excerpt from Dictionary of American Biography: Index; Volumes 1-20 Early in the publication of the twenty volumes of the Dictionary of American Biography it became evident that an analytical index must be compiled if the wealth of the Dictionary was to be made available for reference.* The task of compiling an index of this scope has been great, and the problems have been complicated, but the compilers have rendered patient and devoted service to the end that all subjects in the entire set might be classified and arranged so as to give the Dictionary its maximum usefulness. A tentative list of names was first compiled from earlier works of reference, but it was deficient in the particulars just noted. A classification was then devised on the basis of occupations, trades, and professions, as likely under American conditions to bring to light significant figures in specialized fields of human endeavor. For each of these groups some authority was asked to supply a tentative list. Every such list was submitted to other specialists, or to groups of specialists, who dropped some names, added others, and attempted to make a rating of all. To avoid the possibility of names slipping through the meshes of this drag-net, necrologies of all sorts were carefully searched; and the proposed list of names in the first volume was printed and circulated three months before the volume was sent to the printers, in order to discover serious omissions. Jasper's career has been made the subject of so much laudatory and fantastic writing that it is difficult to arrive at an accurate estimation of his character. Moultrie's appraisal of him as a brave, active, stout, strong, enterprising man, and a very great partisan (moultrie, post, II, 24) would seem to be a just one. As a scout he was adventurous, trustworthy, and loyal, and a perfect Proteus in ability to alter his appearance; he could wear all disguises with admirable ease and dexterity; and he was equally as remarkable for his cunning as for his bravery (garden, post, p. It is said that he could neither read nor write, but the gist of a letter of his, ill-written and worse spelt, is reproduced in Francis Bowen's Life of Benjamin Lincoln (p. Dictionary of American Biography, Vol. 4 - Allen Johnson

Excerpt from Dictionary of American Biography, Vol. 4: Chanfrau-Cushing

The name Unitarian was borrowed from England but it was some time before the independent thinkers of America could bring them selves to adopt it. Charming himself hesitated, fearing that if a new party with a distinctive name were to be formed, it would soon produce a Unitarian orthodoxy with all the limitations and petty tyrannies of the old. He deplored the necessity of organizing a new denomination. I desire, he said, to escape the narrow walls of a particular church, and to live under the open far and wide and seeing with my own eyes and hearing with my own ears. Soon, however, he recognized that the movement had gone beyond his control and then he not only threw himself heartily into it, but became its acknowledged leader. In 1819 he preached a sermon defining the position of the Unitarian party and defending their right to Christian fellowship. The disruption that followed grieved him, but he accepted it as inevitable. In the following year, 1820, he organized the Berry Street Conference of liberal ministers, at a meeting of which in May 1825 there was organized the American Unitarian Association. The first number of the Christian Register, the weekly official organ of the Unitarian denomination, appeared in 1821. Associations and publications alike became vehicles for Channing's thought. Charming Unitarianism came to be and has remained the recognized term for that form of religious liberalism which, while unwavering in its assertion of the right of the human reason as a part of the essential dignity of human nature, still clung fondly to the supernatural element of the Christian tradition. Channing's objection to the Trinitarian orthodoxy of the time was not so much to its doctrine about the nature of the Godhead, as to its View of the nature of man. This he made clear in his epoch-making sermon, The Moral Argument against Calvinism. The idea that human nature was essentially depraved and incapable of natural growth into goodness was abhorrent to him.
